Bulldog Brotherhood More Than a Decade in the Making Local Helicopter Museum's Hands-on History Lessons are Fun for All Ages

Black widow spiders are recognized by the red hourglass shape on their abdomen.

...the insects that we do not want in our homes. moths, cockroaches, ants, flies and more. And they catch their prey using highly developed methods.

Most humans can easily picture a spider's web, with its delicate-looking strands spun in an intricate and recognizable shape. However, though all spiders produce silk from spinneret glands on their bodies, not all spiders use it in the same way. Some spin webs, others line the walls of their burrows in silk, some build egg sacs and others use it to wrap their prey. The strength of a spider's silk is enough that once prey has been caught, it has little chance of escape.

Spiders are classified as arachnids, along with scorpions, mites and ticks. Their general body structure consists of the cephalothorax, where the mouth, eyes and even legs are located, and the abdomen, where the spinnerets are located. Some — but not all — spiders have eight eyes, though many have poor eyesight.

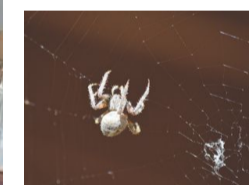

Most spiders are venomous, but many of them are not harmful to humans.

With thousands of spider species in the United States, it's hard to say what you will come in contact with. Southern California has several recognizable spider residents, including the common house and cellar spiders, different orb weavers, wolf spiders and the recognizable black widow.

Easily remembered by its distinctive name and propensity for eating its mate, female black widow spiders are considered the most venomous spider in North America. Jet-black with a red hourglass shape on its abdomen, they are quickly recognizable. Though they're still beneficial, it is a good idea to keep your distance. This shy spider is normally non-aggressive and is unlikely to bite unless provoked. However, a bite will require immediate medical attention. Males and juveniles are harmless.
